

Four thousand years ago Lord Kakon and his army of demons were forced back to their home planet Naraka by a powerful druid named Henge. After a long hard fought battle, Henge and his followers managed to close the gateway between their worlds. But more importantly, Henge succeeded in imprisoning Lord Kakon's general; the mighty Brabazon into a book called The Gateways to Hell. Without Brabazon's powers, the demon army were never able to return. Even though the portal gates were now shut, the fight still continues as some demon masters managed to escape Henge and to this day they wait for the return of their Lord. A few hundred years ago Zantan Mundeara, otherwise known as The Bookman and Princess Aarla had discovered that Brabazon wasn't actually destroyed as they were lead to believe, but had instead been imprisoned inside a book. After torturing many high priests, Zantan and Aarla finally revealed that the only way Brabazon could be released from the magic binding him was for a teenage boy to read from the book. Brabazon would then be able to link with that child taking control of them and breaking free of his imprisonment. Once free he would then unlock the magic protecting the hidden portal at Stone Henge to their home world, where Lord Kakon would once again send his demon armies through to destroy planet earth once and for all. The only problem was that apart from Henge - who hasn't been seen for three thousand years, no one knew what child held the ability to read the book correctly and have the strength to sustain Brabazon's power when their minds merged. For the last two hundred years Zantan has disguised himself as an old man pretending to be a book salesman handing The Gateways to Hell over to teenage boys in the hope that he had found that special child. To this date the only outcome was for each child to be left brain dead, until now!
